Let fond friends blend
Their joys and tears;
One life of duty, one
Toil and to bloom.

A debt to all our race
Is thus assigned;
Wethine we feel the face
Of nature's hand.

But deeper still the voice
Of God shall call;
And glory, and the soul
Shall wake in all.

Oh, lift us to the skies
Where perfect light
Shall show the vision of the eyes
That can behold the sight.

- Longfellow, "Gaudete"

The days of trial by battle on a grand scale are numbered. The days of the armies, of the cannon, of the swords, of the bayonets, are numbered. The day of peace is coming. The day when the soldiers shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks, and the nations shall learn war no more, is not far distant. The world is passing through a crisis. The old order of things is passing away, and the new is preparing to take its place. The wise men of all nations are teaching the people that war is a false and wicked institution, and that peace is the true and blessed condition of human society. The nations are tending to the peaceful pursuits of life, and are making their peace with all men. The day of peace is coming, and the nations shall learn war no more.

- Henry W. Longfellow, "Out of the World of Battle"

The English Iron Trade.

The iron trade of England is the most important of all the industries of the country. It is conducted on a more conservative basis than any other country, and the iron produced in this country is of the finest quality. The iron is manufactured in the northern parts of the country, and the steel in the southern parts. The iron is exported to all parts of the world, and is highly esteemed for its strength and durability.
