

THE COLLISION.

It was one of our usual days in August that Mrs. Newton and her two charming daughter-in-law and son-in-law called to visit us, and then to spend the day with us. Mrs. Newton was the proprietor of one of the towns in the state, and was often visited by her guests. She was always the same-a quiet, suffered soul, who never showed any signs of fatigue or discomfort, but always seemed to be content with her lot. She was always dressed in black, and wore a black hat. She never left her home without her black hat, and never went out without it. Mrs. Newton was always the same-a quiet, suffered soul, who never showed any signs of fatigue or discomfort, but always seemed to be content with her lot. She was always dressed in black, and wore a black hat. She never left her home without her black hat, and never went out without it. She was always dressed in black, and wore a black hat. She never left her home without her black hat, and never went out without it.

But to return to the story. Mrs. Newton had just arrived, and was greeted with the usual courtesy and welcome. We had just finished breakfast, and were all sitting at the table, when Mrs. Newton suddenly exclaimed,

"Oh, look out! Look out! There's something coming towards us!"

We all looked up in surprise, and saw a small, black object approaching us. It was a small, black-looking object, and we were all rather afraid of it. It was the most unusual-looking object we had ever seen, and we were all afraid it might be some new kind of insect or insect-like creature. We all stood up and looked at it, and tried to guess what it was. But we were all rather afraid of it, and we didn't want to do anything that might hurt it.

But Mrs. Newton was not afraid. She was always the same-a quiet, suffered soul, who never showed any signs of fatigue or discomfort, but always seemed to be content with her lot. She was always dressed in black, and wore a black hat. She never left her home without her black hat, and never went out without it.
