HAPPILY RUINED

Author.- Morton as in his room in the house where he was born, was twenty-six and, tall, slim, and fine, with a face that promised, as it was etched with early care, in earnest endeavors, to be a filial, a husband, and a statesman. He was, in short, as he was born, and remained, a gentleman.

In the morning of his thirty-fourth year, Mr. Morton entered the presence of the minister of such a local church as is often, but not always, the training ground of a man. The minister, whom we will call the Rev. Mr. Hinton, was the son of a minister, and came of a long line of clerical ancestors, for which reason we will, in order to avoid the tiresome necessity of repeating the same phrase, call him the Rev. Mr. Hinton-the Rev. Mr. Hinton, that is, of whom we are about to speak. Mr. Hinton had known the Rev. Mr. Morton, whom we now speak of, since their youth, and was therefore better able to judge of his character than most men. He was, therefore, the natural object of Mr. Morton's respect and affection, and in this respect he was like most men. Mr. Morton, who was a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, was therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a gentleman, and therefore a
