The first friction matches were six inches in length and weighed between one and two pounds. They were composed of saltpeter, paper, and a highly inflammable substance. The first successful paper match was invented by John Walker in 1816. He marketed his paper matches under the name "Watson's Patent". These matches were much safer to use than the earlier wooden matches.

The birdировал "Watson's Patent" matches were a significant improvement over the earlier designs. They were safer to use, and they burned more cleanly. The matches were also more convenient to use, as they could be struck against a matchbox or other hard surface. The success of these matches led to the widespread adoption of paper matches, and they remained the standard for many years.

Interestingly, the invention of the friction match was not without controversy. Some people argued that it was an ungodly invention, as it allowed people to light fires at any time of day or night. However, the benefits of the friction match far outweighed any potential弊端, and it quickly became a staple of everyday life.
