I had walked a little way, when I espied a beautiful young lady chatting with a gentleman. The sight of her was the first object that arrested my attention; and, as I stood on the brow of the hill, I beheld her with delight. She was a creature of the most graceful form, and her features were as lovely as her complexion. Her eyes, I fancied, were like the fairest flowers of the field, and her hair was as fair as the lilies of the valley. I was struck with a mixture of admiration and compassion for her, and I determined to visit her the following day.

The next morning I returned to the spot where I had first seen her, and I found her there, engaged in the same occupations of the day. I approached her with a bashful air, and I ventured to make her some inquiries about herself. She was very kind and polite to me, and she made me welcome to her society. I felt a sense of rapture at the sight of her, and I was charmed with her beauty and intelligence. She conversed with me for some time, and she seemed to be deeply interested in my welfare.

After a little while, I bade her good-bye, and I went on my way with a heart full of gratitude. I felt that I had been favorably impressed by this charming creature, and I determined to pay her a second visit as soon as possible. I knew that I should reap the fruits of my kindness, and I was resolved to make her acquaintance more intimately. I felt that I was destined to be happy in her company, and I was full of hope and confidence for the future.
