THE FRONTIER WAIF.

"The lonely village," muttered Bob, as he laid his tired hands on the reins that controlled the old horse which seemed to have as little life in it as the old horse that he was steering along.

As he rode slowly into the village, he saw the old man's face, and the look of intense grief that seemed to be on it. He had just come from a funeral, and now he was going to a funeral.

"I wonder if the old man will ever be satisfied," thought Bob.

But the old man was satisfied. He had just put his last son to rest, and now he was going to bury his last daughter.

Bob rode along the street until he came to a small building that looked like a church.

He dismounted and entered, and found that a funeral was in progress. He walked quietly up to the graveside, and stood there, watching the proceedings.

The coffin was being lowered into the ground, and the mourners were standing around it, weeping and wailing.

Bob looked at the crowd, and then at the coffin, and then at the tomb.

He thought of his own family, and how much he missed them.

But he didn't say anything, for he knew that it was not his place to interfere.

He turned and walked out of the church, and went on his way.

He was going to see his father, who was still alive.

The old man was sitting on a bench in the yard, smoking a pipe.

"Hello, Bob," said the old man, as he saw his son.

"Hello, father," replied Bob.

"What brings you here?"

"I wanted to see you, father," said Bob.

"Come in, and sit down," said the old man, as he pointed to a chair.

Bob sat down, and the old man began to talk.

"Bob," said the old man, "I have something to tell you."

"What is it?"

"It is this. I have always been a poor man, and I have never had much money. But I have always been able to make a living, and I have always been a good father."

"Yes, father," said Bob.

"But now I have a new idea. I have decided to go into the lumber business."

"The lumber business?"

"Yes, father. I have always been interested in it, and I have always thought that I could make a success of it."

"But father,"

"I know, Bob. But I have always thought of you as my son, and I want to see you well taken care of."

"But father,"

"I know, Bob. But I want you to understand that I want you to be happy."

"I understand, father," said Bob.

"Now, Bob, I want you to promise me one thing."

"What is it, father?"

"I want you to promise me that you will never go into the lumber business."

"I promise, father," said Bob.

"Good," said the old man. "Now, go home, and try to have a happy life."

"I will, father," said Bob.

"And remember, Bob, that I love you."

"I know, father," said Bob.

"And now, goodnight, and God bless you."
