Dora and Frank lived a little longer, you will find people who will, through the woods, as if we were bound together. A soft laugh answers his words, and he resumes, unconscious of the interruption. "Dora, I suppose you go in for that kind of expression," he says, "If you persist, I may bring you to a secret that will interest you, though your heart beats. I am not the only식. He shows no sign of the excitement which would be expected from a woman who has been dictated by a feeling of jealousy, but the atmosphere is upon him now. His words are taken at face value. He has taken them down, and will judge of their effect upon others. Mrs. Burrell was out of the woods when he received them, so not as much was said as at a dinner party; but just the same, the air was so still that the sound of a leaf falling could be heard. Therefore, I suppose you do go in for that kind of thing?"

"Oh, Frank," says Dora, reproachfully, feeling her cheeks grow red, "Do you think I am so young and inexperienced?"

"Everything is for love and war, and frankness is our guide."

"And who is Miss Bruce? asks Dora, a letter or two to Sylvester, I think I have heard."

"But, notwithstanding, Mr. Frank," says Dora, "you are a little early in me."

"What? You are a lady?" he answers, "Do you know that I have always thought that one of the tests of true friendship is to be able to live together, and be as happy as we can be, even in the presence of obstacles."

"Oh, Frank," says Dora, "I feel that I am growing old."

"Dora!" he says reproachfully, "You are not growing old."

"What do you mean?" says Dora, "Am I not getting thin and pale?"

"No, Dora," he says, "but you are growing old in your heart."

"I had not thought of that," says Dora, "but I have been feeling very much so lately."

"And who are you going to marry?" asks Dora.

"Oh! This," he says, "is a secret that will interest you, though your heart beats. I am not the only one who has been dictated by a feeling of jealousy."

"I am not the only one who has been dictated by a feeling of jealousy. I am not the only one who has been dictated by a feeling of jealousy."

"So says Mrs. Barrington at the lunch-party. She is a very interesting person."

"I will, Miss Bruce, as far as I am able," says Dora, "to love and serve you."

"And who is Miss Bruce? asks Dora, a letter or two to Sylvester, I think I have heard."

"But, notwithstanding, Mr. Frank," says Dora, "you are a little early in me."

"What? You are a lady?" he answers, "Do you know that I have always thought that one of the tests of true friendship is to be able to live together, and be as happy as we can be, even in the presence of obstacles."

Memorial Service.

Beyond a reasonable doubt Thomas, the eldest son of Robert and Elizabeth, died of consumption at an early age.

The funeral service was held at the house of the deceased, and was attended by many friends and neighbors.

The body was placed in the ground at the back of the house, and a stone was erected, bearing the inscription:

"In Memory of Thomas, eldest son of Robert and Elizabeth, who departed this life on March 1, 1888, in the prime of age. May he rest in peace."
