Clifford's Recompense.

Without, the snow was falling heavily and fast, and the window-panes were running over with large drops. He had sat a long story.

While he had been thus engaged, and his hand was raised in the air, telling the story, a gentleman entered the room. It was Mr. Hunnewell. He had been reading a book, and had met the young lady at the door with a pleasant nod. She returned it, and asked him if he would call to see her. He said he would, and she invited him to dinner on the following day. He thanked her, and left the room.

The only thing of note that happened during the evening was that Mr. Hunnewell and Miss Deane were engaged, and the news was kept a secret until they could announce it.

The engagement was announced the next day, and the couple was seen together in public for the first time. They were both dressed in black, and their faces were as pale as the snow.

The engagement was received with universal joy, and the couple were congratulated by all who saw them. They were married a few months later, and lived happily ever after.
