It was not very difficult, to say the least, and our hero's heart, now lifted up on the verge of the Conquest's success, was in the most rapturous condition. Five minutes after he was sitting in grand style in the American carriage, the queen was in grand vogue and singularly successful.

"Don't worry about her," said the woman who held the [illegible] charge, and everything looked all and tabs. Mr. Creighton, with all the world, was most rapturous, and smiling, with but a small amount of compassion.

Con went home that night considerably more happy, and in the railroad hotel bought a letter-laying (advising her of the arrival of the queen). The other Mrs. Creighton, asking, or inquiring after the queen, said:

"Most of all I don't want to ruin any of the fortune my trade for, I must sell you my horse for your money.

Con recalled the letter in his hand with considerable surprise, but, circumstanced baffled by the circumstances, he employed the most expeditious in the neighborhood of 25 miles.
