Lewis Mumford Speaks at Penn. Lectures on Frank Lloyd Wright

Two weeks ago Frank Lloyd Wright died, and in front of the Fine Arts Building at the University of Pennsylvania, a long black streamer hung at half mast on the Harmonie Quartet. April 13, a lecture room in the Fine Arts Building was filled with graduate students and faculty members heard Lewis Mumford give a brilliant and witty lecture analyzing Wright's architecture and art. Mumford himself is something of an authority on the American genius. He might best be tagged a super-nationalist, and in his lectures he has been his business to explore the process of developing civilizations, with particular attention to the relationship between man and his machines and machines and buildings. His four-year-volume series called "The Mind-Body," a series of six books, will be published in the near future. His book, "Anew" has been received with great acclaim. Mumford's lectures have been well received and have drawn a large audience. His book, "Anew," has been well received and has drawn a large audience.

A STUDENT, A JESUIT AND A CARPENTER
by John Swinton

Sometimes last year, Father Peter Behler, a JESUIT and a carpenter, invited me to discover the extent to which Father Behler was interested in the philosophy of work and the possible contributions of the JESUIT and spiritual traditions to the study of work.

Father Behler and I have been working together for many years on various projects related to work and spirituality. Our collaboration has been enriching and rewarding, and we have enjoyed exploring the many dimensions of work and its relationship to our faith.

Father Behler's approach to work is rooted in the JESUIT tradition, which emphasizes the importance of work as a means of spiritual growth and development. He believes that work is a way to serve God and neighbor, and that it is an opportunity to develop one's talents and abilities.

Father Behler's work as a carpenter has also been a source of inspiration for him, as he sees it as a way to connect with the physical world and to engage in a meaningful activity that is not just about making money.

Our collaboration has led to various projects, including a book we are currently working on, which explores the intersection of work and spirituality in the JESUIT tradition.

We believe that our approach to work and spirituality can be relevant for many people, regardless of their religious background. We hope that our collaboration will continue to provide insights and inspiration for those who are interested in exploring the relationship between work and spirituality.
