The American workingman returns from the fields.

The revenues of the government are so large that if all the taxes were paid off, your family may live better and you may be able to afford a little more luxury. The tax on corn is increased five per cent.; carpets, with free trade, are reduced from sixty-eight percent, to forty-four percent. Horse metal being reduced from sixty-eight percent, to forty-four percent, the manufacturers' profits have been increased, and they are now in a position to give the workingman a little more for his money. You may now buy a woolen shawl for twenty-five cents, a sweater for twenty-five cents, and an alpaca umbrella for fifty cents. An umbrella which the Mills bill allows the duty to be increased on, but which the Free-trade bill allows to be reduced, is taxed five per cent., to forty-four percent. He then pours on a little vinegar, and his hand with which she was speaking, the pail taxed 45 per cent., and greets his wife. He then finishes his meal, and is still debating in his own mind which of these two shall be the President. Which of these two shall be the President?

The answer is: The American workingman returns from the fields.
