A BACK DOOR ROMANCE.

By Laura Read Dougherty.

She was only a servant, employed, in the city of Philadelphia, in a house of beauty and fashion, to wait upon the sick. She was only a servant, but the maid had been there twenty years, and was still admired and respected by all who knew her. She was only a servant, but she had the confidence and respect of all who dwelt in the house of her employer.

He had come out with the busy man to look about the house, and to see if there was anything that required his attention. He had been there for several years, and was well known in the neighborhood. He had come out with the busy man to look about the house, and to see if there was anything that required his attention. He had been there for several years, and was well known in the neighborhood.

We are authorized to state that the house is in a perfect state of repair, and that there is no danger of fire. It is a house of beauty and fashion, and the servants are all well satisfied with their employment. The house is in a perfect state of repair, and there is no danger of fire. The logical tendency of the Reading Railroad Com-mission seems to be fully as clearly expressed by Sir Quay as by the Treasury, and chancing upon the condition of affairs in this para-graph—

WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, D. C., June 30, 1890.

The Senate still remains at a standstill. The last week of this month it will resume business, but it seems that the Senate is content to let the matter hang. A bill abolishing the coffee monopoly has been taken off the Senate calendar. The House is considering a bill for the suppression of the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, which the Senate has already passed.

The demands of the Democrats for the resignation of President Harrison are increasing. The Senate is considering a resolution, which, if adopted, will be sent to the House of Representatives. This resolution is, of course, expected to be adopted by the House.

The House committee on the Coinage has reported favorably on the report of the pro-ducts of the Convention. The strength of the Senate is, at present, about equal to that of the House of Representatives.

In the meantime, the House will continue to consider the Federal Election bill, which is expected to be passed by both houses before another year shall close. The stock of the Union Pacific is now at $4,000,000, a new pension measure is expected to be introduced by Mr. Conger, chairman of the Coinage committee, called upon him and told him that Representative Conger, chairman of the Coinage Committee, was in favor of free coinage, but bad neverthe-less made a report of the pro-ducts of the Convention. The strength of the Senate is, at present, about equal to that of the House of Representatives.
