The Collegeville Roller Mills.

THE ROLLER PROCESS.

From the earliest days of the utilization of power for the purpose of human convenience, it has been the custom to use it to perform labor that is too arduous for the strength of man. The first great step in this direction was the introduction of the new roller process, which now stands in the East and West as an example of the success and efficiency of the new machinery. The object of the process is to crush the grain into a fine powder, and this is accomplished by grinding it between two rolls, or sets of rollers, which are kept in constant motion. The rolls are made of hard iron, and the pressure is exerted by a series of pulleys which are operated by a steam engine. The process is not only to comminute the grain, but also to separate the bran and the germ, the former being thrown out as waste, and the latter being used for the production of flour. The process is also employed for the production of sugar, starch, and other products.

The process is not only efficient, but also economical. The cost of the machinery is low, and the labor required is small. The process is also very quick, and the product is ready for consumption in a short time. The process is also very clean, and the product is free from dust and dirt. The process is also very flexible, and can be adapted to the production of any kind of grain, whether it be wheat, corn, or oats. The process is also very simple, and can be taught to any person who understands the art of grinding.

The process is not only economical, but also healthy. The grain is not subjected to the danger of exposure to the air, and is not liable to become infected with disease.
