A THRILLING NIGHT

WASHINGTON, July 4th, 1863.

RE: W. N. HODGKIN, Attorney-at-Law, Providence, R. I.

I have just returned from the fair, and I have much to say about it, but I will confine myself to one subject. This year the fair was held at suburban Hill, which is a pretty village on the outskirts of the city.

I arrived there about ten o'clock, and was met by the governor of the state. He was wearing a suit of black, and looked very dignified. We proceeded to the main building, which was crowded with people. The governor spoke, and then the president of the fair was introduced. He was a wealthy man, and he spoke in a loud voice. He announced that the fair would be opened at ten o'clock, and that there would be a grand parade.

The governor then turned to me, and said: "Mr. Hodgin, I want you to go to the fair and write a description of it. I think it will be a great success." I thanked him, and then went to the fair.

The fair was very large and well arranged. There were many buildings, and they were all crowded. The governor was right in saying that it would be a great success.

I will describe some of the buildings.

The administration building was the largest. It was five stories high, and it was covered with a roof. The governor said that it would be used for the accommodation of the officials of the fair.

The education building was next in size. It was three stories high, and it was covered with a roof. The governor said that it would be used for the accommodation of the educational department.

The industrial building was next in size. It was two stories high, and it was covered with a roof. The governor said that it would be used for the accommodation of the industrial department.

The agricultural building was next in size. It was one story high, and it was covered with a roof. The governor said that it would be used for the accommodation of the agricultural department.

The military building was next in size. It was half a story high, and it was covered with a roof. The governor said that it would be used for the accommodation of the military department.

The fair was very well attended. There were many people there, and they were all crowded.

I will now describe some of the exhibits.

The exhibits in the administration building were very interesting. There were many beautiful paintings, and they were all crowded.
