Washington, March 4. Mr. James B. McPherson, editor of the Chicago Tribune, in an article in its editorial page, said that "the whole surface of the country was red with the blood of the South." He added that this was the result of the war, which had been "fought by men who were as much at fault as the Southerners who initiated it." Mr. McPherson went on to say that the toll of lives lost in the war was "incalculable." He concluded that "the world has paid a heavy price for this war, and we must be content to bear the burden that has been placed upon us."
