STATE FUNCTIONS

In a general sense it is clearly desirable that the functions of the State should in some degree conform to the struggle for existence. This is true of the State just as it is true of any human being. For this reason the State must be able to protect itself against external enemies and to defend itself against the attacks of powerful individuals or groups. The State must also be able to protect itself against civil disorders and to maintain order within its boundaries. For this reason the State must be able to regulate the conduct of its citizens and to impose penalties upon those who violate its laws. The State must also be able to provide for the general welfare of its citizens and to promote the interests of the community at large. For this reason the State must be able to regulate the conduct of its citizens and to impose penalties upon those who violate its laws. The State must also be able to provide for the general welfare of its citizens and to promote the interests of the community at large.

The struggle for existence is a struggle for the survival of the fittest. It is a struggle for the right to live and to be able to continue to live. The State must be able to protect itself against external enemies and to defend itself against the attacks of powerful individuals or groups. The State must also be able to protect itself against civil disorders and to maintain order within its boundaries. For this reason the State must be able to regulate the conduct of its citizens and to impose penalties upon those who violate its laws. The State must also be able to provide for the general welfare of its citizens and to promote the interests of the community at large. For this reason the State must be able to regulate the conduct of its citizens and to impose penalties upon those who violate its laws. The State must also be able to provide for the general welfare of its citizens and to promote the interests of the community at large.

For example, it is clear that the State must be able to protect itself against external enemies and to defend itself against the attacks of powerful individuals or groups. The State must also be able to protect itself against civil disorders and to maintain order within its boundaries. For this reason the State must be able to regulate the conduct of its citizens and to impose penalties upon those who violate its laws. The State must also be able to provide for the general welfare of its citizens and to promote the interests of the community at large. For this reason the State must be able to regulate the conduct of its citizens and to impose penalties upon those who violate its laws. The State must also be able to provide for the general welfare of its citizens and to promote the interests of the community at large.

The State must also be able to protect itself against external enemies and to defend itself against the attacks of powerful individuals or groups. The State must also be able to protect itself against civil disorders and to maintain order within its boundaries. For this reason the State must be able to regulate the conduct of its citizens and to impose penalties upon those who violate its laws. The State must also be able to provide for the general welfare of its citizens and to promote the interests of the community at large.
