ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

BY S. E. YOUNG.

When the snow came, that October night, Marion Hartley, with the assistance of her bright ideas, planned a Christmas Eve party. The idea was to make it a real party, a party for a merry Christmas. She decided to do it for the sake of bettering her literary skill.

First, she invited her friends. There were fifteen at the party. They were all young girls, and they were all invited to the party.

Then, she arranged the decorations. She decided to make everything as beautiful as possible. She arranged the room and the tables, and the chairs, and the curtains, and the lamps. She arranged everything with great care.

Next, she arranged the menu. She decided to serve a variety of dishes. She arranged for the roast chicken, the roast beef, the roast pork, and the roast veal. She also arranged for the roast beef and the roast pork.

Then, she arranged the games. She decided to have a variety of games. She arranged for the dominoes, the cards, and the checkers, and the backgammon, and the chess. She arranged everything with great care.

After that, she arranged the music. She decided to have a variety of music. She arranged for the piano, the violin, and the cello, and the clarinet, and the flute. She arranged everything with great care.

Then, she arranged the dancing. She decided to have a variety of dancing. She arranged for the slow dance, the quick step, and the waltz, and the polka, and the tango. She arranged everything with great care.

Finally, she arranged the poetry. She decided to have a variety of poetry. She arranged for the sonnets, the haiku, and the free verse, and the epic, and the lyric. She arranged everything with great care.

When the snow came, that October night, Marion Hartley, with the assistance of her bright ideas, planned a Christmas Eve party. The idea was to make it a real party, a party for a merry Christmas. She decided to do it for the sake of bettering her literary skill.

THE SCIENCE OF FERTILIZING

PROF. H. L. C. LAYTON,
Instructor in Agriculture, Cornell University.

Instructions given from an experienced nurseryman are of considerable value, but the farmer must take them in conjunction with the actual conditions of his own farm. The kind of soil, the previous crops, diseases and pests, and other circumstances, before he can apply any rule to the system of farming he proposes to follow.
The main point is how a man seeks to ascertain the best advantages of his soil and the best and most profitable crops for the same price.

We have seen farmers who have seen nothing native to a certain tract of land, and yet they have applied the same fertilizers to the same kind of soil, that have done their work, but they may have been lost on the way.

The writer, however,
believes that all farmers who have never seen the same price.
