ECOSYSTEM Hears Oil Co. View of Energy Crisis

By TONY RASKIN

The Economics Club held its second meeting of the year, Wednesday, Nov. 19th in the Ship- room in Bomberger. The guest speaker for the evening was Robert J. Bankhead, who is a senior economist for the New York Power Corporation. His speech was on the "energy problem as seen by a private oil company.

During the question period, many students expressed concern over the possible shortage of natural gas. Chairman Allen also stated that his viewpoint was on this issue. Dr. Wilkinson related some statistics concerning oil production and the question of whether the energy crisis is over. He indicated that there had been a great increase in the production of natural gas since 1973. This was due to the Arab oil embargo, with its effect of concentrating more on domestic sources and the current recession. However, Dr. Wilkinson noted that it is not likely that the industry "pros" underestimated the growth of energy demand. He stated that the company uses long-term forecasting charts to make predictions on short-term predictions, for perhaps the next five years.

The second topic centered on the energy crisis, and Dr. Wilkinson stated that the companies would continue to rely on oil in the future, but were considering other fuels relatively cheaper. For example, solar power was being considered as an alternate energy source. However, it was still not plentiful, according to information from foreign sources because the industry is "pros" underestimated the growth of energy demand.
